Dear Chris,

Those reading this who are our full-service Members have already received my recommendation changes earlier this morning, including new positions augmenting our energy services-related holdings. Those stocks have REALLY caught fire in the past couple weeks; and though they may need to consolidate a bit again, there remains a LOT of catching up for them to do.

In the case of one of my "Featured Opportunity" companies, Alberta-based Enterprise Group (TSE-E; OTC-ETOLF), its own price spike of the recent past is all about this same dynamic of long-dormant energy service stocks catching up to the overall sector's better health, and more.

In the third quarter, the company continued its steady recovery from the late energy bear market, increasing its free cash flow and even scoring a small net profit for the quarter. With its business continuing to improve on all fronts--energy as well as infrastructure--I anticipate the fourth quarter results to come will be *better still. (NOTE: Yesterday, Enterprise announced that it had inked yet another new equipment rental and services agreement with one of Canada's largest energy producers.)

Enterprise slimmed down necessarily during the energy sector's doldrums, while still keeping pretty much all its key business segments in tact. Now that the recovery is underway, these new contracts and better income are set to have an even more dramatic impact on the company's financial performance. Thus, it's my view that Enterprise shares remain a "BUY" even after this recent spike, especially when you consider they are STILL selling for less than half the company's book value!

For a refresher, go back and read (or re-read) my FULL COMPANY REPORT on Enterprise from early last Spring; one I'll be updating shortly for our audience, and augmenting with an interview with management you'll be able to take in in the near future!

All the best,

Chris Temple -- Editor/Publisher
